Working from Home? How to Boost Your Energy Levels Every Day

While working from home has its perks, it also has its downsides. One of the most common challenges is keeping motivation and energy levels high, especially if you thrive in more social environments.

The problem is that a lack of a steady routine and social isolation can drain your energy, which isn't good for productivity. To help, here are nine simple tips for increasing your energy levels throughout each day.

Focus on One Thing at a Time

In certain situations, multitasking is a great skill, but it can also kill productivity. When we ask our brain to shift attention from one activity to another, it literally drains our mental energy. Instead, list your daily tasks in order of priority and then focus on each one individually.

Doing one thing at a time will not only help you perform each task more efficiently; it will also preserve your energy for the remaining tasks.

Stay Connected

Regular human contact keeps your brain active and actually helps to boost your energy levels. To help yourself stay focused, keep in touch with colleagues via instant messages, voice calls, and video conferencing tools. Establish communication protocols with coworkers so you don't disrupt other people's time. Even scheduling one meeting per day will help to keep you motivated.

Eat More Nutritious Food

Eating whole, natural foods and avoiding processed foods with added sugar will help your body maintain optimal performance. Try to do the following:

- Eat one fist-size portion of vegetables with every meal.
- Avoid sugary drinks and snacks.
- Include more healthy fats in your diet, such as avocados, nuts, and fatty fish.
- Include protein in every meal.
- Add nutritional supplements to your smoothies, such as spirulina powder, acai powder, and chia seeds.

Go for a Walk in the Morning

If possible, start your day with a brisk walk around the block or park. If the sun is shining, even better; sunshine is the best source of vitamin D, which can improve your mood by boosting serotonin levels in your brain. Vitamin D can also improve your sleep quality, lower blood pressure, and improve brain function. As well as improving your self-esteem, walking may also help you think more creatively.

Swap Coffee for Alternatives

While the caffeine in coffee may give you a quick energy boost, its effects will quickly wear off and it can lead to an energy slump. Try alternative drinks such as green tea or peppermint tea, which are high in antioxidants and include compounds that improve brain function and reduce stress levels.

Drink More Water

When you're not properly hydrated, your body can't function at its maximum efficiency. This will quickly lead to you feeling drained and less mentally alert. Drink water throughout the day to prevent dehydration and keep your mind more active all day long.

Take Regular Breaks

Sitting still for too long in one place can have a significantly negative impact on your mental and physical health. Try to take a break about once every hour for at least five minutes. It allows you to stretch your legs, gets your blood flowing, and helps you to feel re-energized when you return to work. In five minutes, you could make a drink, stretch, meditate, or even call a friend for a quick chat. Just try to do it away from your regular work spot.

Take Naps

A short nap of around 15 to 30 minutes has been shown to improve concentration levels and performance. If you feel your energy dip in the mid-afternoon, take 30 minutes to lie down in a dark room and try to get some sleep. Even if you don't sleep, the relaxation should help you feel more energized when you get back to work.

Aim for Seven or Eight Hours of Sleep

At the end of each day, it's crucial to get enough sleep to recharge your body and mind. Even though people need at least seven hours of uninterrupted sleep every night, many people don't manage to get enough. To help you get a better night's sleep, avoid caffeine after midday, drink less alcohol, and avoid using electronics an hour before you go to bed. Once you've worked out a successful routine, stick to this bedtime ritual so that your body and mind are prepared for a good sleep.

It's Up to You

If you lack energy when you're working from home, you're not alone. Fortunately, there are various techniques you can use to improve your energy levels. The strategies highlighted here are just some of the best ways to combat fatigue, but you may find even better ways to feel energized as you learn to adapt to remote working.

Start with these techniques and you'll soon start to feel less tired throughout each day, and you should be able to work more efficiently and effectively as a result.

4 Tips for Designing a Brochure for Your Business

A brochure is the centerpiece of your business' print marketing materials. A quality brochure will explain what your company has to offer in a succinct and organized way. A poorly executed brochure will only serve to confuse and frustrate its reader. The following guidelines will help you create an effective, informative brochure for your potential customers.

White Space is Your Friend

When designing a brochure, there's a desire to squeeze everything about your business onto it. The problem is, a brochure is supposed to provide someone with a brief overview of your business, not a detailed accounting of everything you do and are. People are more likely to want to look over something short and sweet, rather than dense and lengthy.

If the point of your brochure is to get someone to read it, filling its pages with too much information is exactly the way to ensure no one will. Leaving more white space will make your brochure more pleasing to the eye. White space helps readers better take in information. It makes for improved legibility and understanding. Consider, for instance, the space between the paragraphs in this article. Visually, they help you understand how this article is organized.

sense of your business' ethos. It can be tempting to avoid using photos because they take up precious text space in a brochure, but remember the old saying "a picture's worth a thousand words." A single picture can say more about your company than a paragraph or two.

For instance, if you were looking at a company's brochure and there was a picture of smiling staff members wrapping Christmas presents together, what would you think? Perhaps that this business dedicates time to volunteer work, or staff members are important to this business, or that this business's staff are generally happy. Picking the right photos is of high importance. If you use stock photos, be careful that they don't look too staged; this can give off a phony feeling about your business.

Employ Lists and Bullet Points When Possible

Lists and bullet points are great for summarizing information, which your brochure is supposed to be doing. Readers appreciate lists because they are a quick read. Running your eyes down a list of services, rather than reading a dense paragraph naming all of them, makes for a more enjoyable reading experience.

The information you decide to put in a bullet list is emphasized because it stands out from the rest of the content, so consider what you want to place that much emphasis on. Are your business' values really important to who you are? Or maybe your services are what you want to highlight? A reader who only skims your brochure is more likely to take in information from the bullet list than from the prose.

Stick to Your Business' Colors

Your brochure is a key document for your business' brand. For that reason, you want to be sure to highlight your business' colors in the brochure. Is your logo blue and yellow? Try using those two colors at different opacity levels as the main colors for your brochure. If you must add a third color, do so. But try not to use more than three main colors in your brochure; more than that, and it will start to look unprofessional.

TOP EMAIL MARKETING TRENDS IN 2020

Email marketing is still relevant to digital marketing and will be, well into 2020. However, keep in mind that like other online marketing strategies, email marketing is always adapting, changing, and advancing with the technology around it.

According to Marketo, 94 percent of internet users will go online simply to check their email. One of the reasons for its popularity is its appeal to users across many generations, cultures, and social classes. People have used email for many years and will continue to as the digital landscape evolves.

Even with the rise of social media and certain audio/visual channels such as YouTube, email isn't going anywhere and will be invaluable to any marketing campaign.

The Biggest Email Marketing Trends in 2020
There are several key trends to follow if you want to get the most from your 2020 email marketing campaigns. Whether you're a B2B or B2C business, it's important to stay on top of your email marketing strategies to avoid inefficiencies and wasted efforts.

An Emphasis on Interactivity

As more people enjoy interactive media, email marketing will be no exception in 2020. If your email isn't optimized, most people will likely delete it, making it necessary to optimize for multiple devices including laptops, tablets, and smartphones.

A combination of responsiveness and interactivity will give your campaigns what they need to thrive. While interactivity used to be designed for entertaining recipients, interactivity will entail functionality, encouraging users to engage with your brand and preventing them from simply closing your emails.

People want to be able to effectively engage with your brand through email. Some interactive features in your emails can include:

- Product carousels and interactive images that users can control
- Animated calls-to-action and buttons
- Rollover effects that display product offerings
- Accordion email design features that keep longer emails compact
- User-generated content along with polls, and surveys

User-Generated Content

This type of content can include any kind of text, video, images, or audio that the user creates. You can use this content to help encourage more engagement with your brand among influencers and potential customers. You can always drive the creation of user-generated content by enticing users with incentives. In turn, you'll benefit from content that adds a touch of authenticity to your emails and can subsequently increase conversion rates.

3dcart, a leading eCommerce company, found that 82 percent of consumers find user-generated company reviews to be extremely valuable and that 70 percent will typically look for ratings or reviews prior to making a buying decision. 3dcart also determined that email users are three times more likely to share content via social media than those who come from another channel, which means that social media shares a kind of symbiotic relationship with email marketing that makes the latter important to utilize as a business.

Today, you can easily get a start on collecting user-generated content by understanding when, why, and how to gather any feedback. Certain tools out there can automate the process.

You can direct users to broad surveys by asking a simple question, but knowing precisely when to request feedback is key. Make sure the user has ample time to experience your products or services before you ask them to comment on the experience. Email marketing software out there can help with this, sending feedback requests at the appropriate times.

The Importance of Accessibility

You can also expect to see accessibility to remain as important as ever in 2020, particularly as voice assistants such as Alexa read emails aloud to users. Millions of smart speakers will be installed all over the world by 2020, which means that email marketers will want to target these devices with readable emails. One of the reasons for the rise in popularity of email readers is the number of people living with impaired vision.

In addition to the challenge of reaching people with vision impairments and other disabilities, marketers need to accommodate for people who have limited connectivity and an overall lack of access to today's technology.

Thankfully, assistive technology has made it easier for people to connect via email marketing and other channels.

Making Content Accessible

One of the first steps to take is to make sure that your content is accessible. This means keeping emails brief and succinct. Today, people don't typically have the attention span to read through a long, tiresome email when they can get the same information in a bite-sized format. Ideally, emails should be no more than around 50 words long if you want to hold your readers' attention.

You can make email content accessible by using shorter sentences, limiting the number of difficult words, and localizing content for worldwide audiences. Accessibility of Design You should also make your email designs accessible for your audiences, which entails relying less on all-image templates while utilizing real text HTML. You should also develop a strong visual hierarchy in your emails, avoid long stretches of center-justified text, implement the right font sizes, and make use of contrasting colors for improved readability.

Using Accessible HTML Code

Code is one of the best tools for improving accessibility for all users. This is key to taking advantage of assistive technologies, which depend primarily on HTML. You'll be able to ensure your email marketing campaigns are accessible with proper code implementation.

First, make sure that all images have alt text descriptions. Next, make sure screen readers can access any HTML tables. You'll also want to use semantic HTML and be sure to specify a language.

Taking all of these steps to make your email strategy accessible to users will allow you to reach those millions of users you may not be able to market to otherwise.

How Automation is Changing the Game

Over the last 10 years, we've seen many changes to email automation, and the next decade will only see more. It's important these days to integrate email into the rest of your marketing campaigns, and cloud technology makes it easier than ever to automate your processes.

Apart from cloud tech, you can also leverage machine learning and deep learning to superpower your email marketing platforms. Automated segmentation is another advantage that will help improve performance, accessibility, and customizability.

Reports are also automated, so you never need to remember to manually create a report.

Ultimately, email marketing in 2020 will allow you to spend more time growing your business and less time managing your campaigns with full automation.

What You Can Expect with Email Marketing in 2020

While it's impossible to predict exactly how 2020 will go in terms of marketing, as things always change and evolve in directions we might not anticipate, it definitely looks like email marketing will continue to become both easier and more useful as the year progresses.

You'll be able to effectively improve your marketing campaigns and see increased ROI with an email strategy that's interactive, automated, and accessible, with engaging user-generated content.

The Types of Facebook Ads to Utilize in 2020

Facebook remains one of the best ways to reach your target audience, offering you the chance to connect with millions of users on what continues to be the world's largest social network.

Although Facebook uses an algorithm that's constantly changing to make it more difficult than it used to be to connect with users, the platform's micro-targeting features enable businesses to find the specific people they want to attract. Through Facebook, you can place your business front and center for users who are most likely to be interested in your services or products.

If you want to take advantage of this potentially invaluable marketing resource, there are several ads you can use for your campaigns. The types of ads you use will depend on how you want to connect with your audience.

Image Ads

Facebook image ads are among the best starting points for Facebook advertising. You can create them in very little time by boosting one of your page's existing posts with an image.

While image ads are often simple, you can keep them interesting by using engaging photos and accompanying text content. Image ads are a potentially eye-catching way to bring more people to your page and, ultimately, your website.

Video Ads

You can also further engage audiences by using video ads, which you can run in either your News Feed or your Stories. You can also have them appear as in-video ads for longer videos with ad breaks. You can use these ads to showcase your products or provide audiences a glimpse of your team at work.

Keep in mind that you don't necessarily need to film anything to create a video ad. Appealing animations can also attract audiences or entice prospective customers with offers. You can also target specific locations with geo-specific offers while showing users which of their Facebook friends already like your page.

Video Polls

In addition to video ads, you can also use polls for further engagement.

Video poll ads are mobile-only ads that feature an interactive poll. According to Facebook, these ads are actually better at increasing brand awareness than traditional video ads.

Carousel Ads

Using as many as 10 videos or images, carousel ads are great for showcasing your services or products. You can even use these ads to highlight specific benefits of one or more products, or use several photos to create a panorama for your business that users can scroll through within a single carousel.

Slideshow Ads

Slideshow ads give marketers a simple easy-to-use method for creating brief video ads made from multiple photos, video clips, or even text. Don't have your own videos to use? Not a problem-- simply select stock photos that are ideal for your ad using the Ads Manager.

Slideshows can feature the same kind of motion as video ads while using far less bandwidth to allow for faster loading times, which is particularly useful for engaging users with a slower internet connection.

These ads are among the easiest tools to utilize for your Facebook marketing campaigns.

Instant Experience Ads

Formerly known as Canvas, Instant Experience ads are full-screen ads that load around 15 times faster than mobile websites outside of Facebook.

You can use these ads to link to other Instant Experiences to allow more access to additional instant content.

Dynamic Ads

Dynamic ads give marketers the ability to promote targeted products to customers who are more likely to purchase them based on their interests.

Say someone has visited a product page on your website or added an item to their shopping cart via your online store, but then neglected to finalize their purchase. You can use dynamic ads in these cases to target those specific products the user was interested in, getting them to appear in the user's Facebook feed.

With the help of these ads, you'll be able to remind users of the item they were interested in, potentially bringing them back to make one or more purchases. You can use these in conjunction with collection, image, carousel, and Stories ads.

Lead Ads

These mobile-only ads are designed to make it easier for users to provide contact information without the need to type a lot. You can use these ads to collect subscriptions to your newsletters, product trial signups, or requests for more information about your product or service offerings.

You can also use Messenger bots to qualify prospective customers or clients while lowering the cost of lead generation. Stories Ads

A recent Scientific American study found that 72 percent of millennials don't rotate their smartphones to view widescreen videos, but with Stories ads you can take advantage of the phone's vertical format to take up the entire screen.

Augmented Reality Ads

Augmented reality (AR) ads use features such as animation and filters that encourage interaction with your brand. It's still relatively new, but many people are trying this feature and finding it to be useful to enhance their Stories ads.

Collection Ads

Collection ads are paid ads that are only for mobile devices. They allow businesses to highlight five products that customers can purchase in a single collection.

These ads work with Instant Experience ads to allow people to make a purchase without leaving Facebook. This is particularly useful for those shoppers who don't have the time or sufficient connectivity to visit your website but still want to buy your products.

Messenger Ads

Over 1.3 billion people use Facebook Messenger every month, making this a great way to connect with your audience. You can create Messenger ads by simply selecting Messenger and the Facebook feed as the placement for your ads during the ad creation process.

Users also have the ability to push “click-to-Messenger” ads through the Facebook feed. These feature call-to-action buttons that open Messenger conversations with the business’s Facebook page to allow people to engage in a conversation with your customer service reps or salespeople.

Playable Ads

Playable ads are also becoming more and more popular among users as a form of brand interactivity. Developers can create a mini-game that functions as an ad while providing entertainment value.

Regardless of the types of ads you use, you can give your Facebook marketing strategies what they need to thrive and dominate the market. Used in conjunction with your other marketing tools, Facebook will continue to be one of the most important assets to utilize in 2020.
